Brake Shoe

Introduction

The braking system for cars, trucks, and other vehicles includes auto brake pads. An auto brake pad's function is to create friction on a revolving drum's surface in order to slow or stop the vehicle. As a component of the brake system, brake shoes are also utilized with drums. They work to slow or stop the drum by converting kinetic energy into thermal energy.

Uses & Applications

Automobiles are where auto brake pads are most frequently used. Due to the fact that cars are one of the most widely used forms of transportation in the world, brake pads are always in great demand. Wear and tear of these components is unavoidable because cars are frequently utilized. When these components wear out, it's crucial to replace them in order to keep your car operating smoothly.

Manufacturing Process

Raw materials are the first step in the production of auto brake pads and shoes. The raw ingredients are then heated, formed, and ultimately packed after being cut to size. When the raw ingredients are melted in a furnace at temperatures above 2500 degrees Fahrenheit, manufacturing begins. Depending on the size of the material, this process could take up to an hour. When the metal reaches that temperature, it is poured into a mould and allowed to cool for about 15 minutes before being severed from the pouring vessel by a device propelled by compressed air.
